

Arab Spring: Social Constructivism as a New Method of Regime Change

Hasith Kandaudahewa

Department of International Relations, University of Colombo, Sri Lanka

hasithrock101@gmail.com

Mostly, Social Constructivism is used as a concept in the Social Sciences to address social movement and to understand rational human behaviour. Concurrent to this, there had been many dialogues on social constructivism related with the realist approach. Recently social constructivism became more relevant to analyze social trends and uprisings.

Continually dictatorships in the Middle East region created political problems as well as social problems among Muslim and Non-Muslim communities. As a result of social depression people came forward to change the regime and establish a new political system for their own kind. But unfortunately nowadays, local issues become more sensitive to international power politics and balance through the modern state system. Since the beginning of the Arabian social movement, mass media and international actors give more influence to determine the approach of social movements. Then finally the dream of democratic government was robbed by outsiders such as Multi-National Companies, Super Powers, Global and regional powers.

This paper discusses how the concept of social constructivism used to change dictatorships and establish puppet regimes rather than democratic regimes. Moreover, the paper will highlight how social movements were hijacked from the local communities and how western powers use it continuously to ensure their interests in the region, as well as to why it happened and how its influence to regional power balance and challenge the future social movements.

More confidential primary sources such as Government Press Releases, speeches made by authorities are highly useful to examine this context. Secondary sources such as 3rd party interviews, newspaper and journal articles will be referred to understand the context and address the research issues properly. Both primary and secondary sources will be referred to address the context.

Keywords: Arab spring, Regime change, Social constructivism, Social movements